THE HUMAN HEART

Pumping Machine.

When the doctor puts his ear to your chest or applies the stethoscope, which only conducts the sounds more clearly, what does he hear? The sound of the normal heart is like the pronunciation of the syllables "lub-dup" close to each other. These syllables are heard in quick succession, and then comes a pause-the diastole or resting period of the great force pump. The sound "lub" is that of the blood flowing out under muscular pressure, and the "dup" is the closing of the aortic ways have marched and always will valves. If this sound "dup" is not heard it shows that the aortic valves are destroyed or not working.

The latest explanation of this first sound, "lub," is that it is caused by the muscular contraction of the heart and the impulse of the heart against the chest wall. The first sound is heard more clearly over the apex of the heart, the point of the chest nearest to the ventricle. The second sound is best heard over the aortic valves, which lie beneath the left side of the chest just by the third rib.

If you close a door with great force the slam is very loud, and if the tension in the aorta is very high the sound "dap" is louder than usual. This is most important to the physician, for he then knows that there is at business, as rich men's sens almost high arterial tension, due to what is invariably do. termed an aneurism. If the sound "lub" is weaker than normal it would indicate a weakness of the heart muscle and this is the case in fevers. In typhoid fever, for instance! when this first sound is very weak, we know that the heart is so weak as to make the case alarming. A heart is said to have a "murmur" when the sharp "dup" disappears and the listening physician hears a softened noise called a "murmur." If you try to say "dup" with your lips open the sound uttered will be like that the doctor hears in the diseased heart whose valves do not close properly. The sound produced is something like "duff," and if the mitral valve does not if it were a single organ, but actually it is two hearts joined together, the right and the left heart. The right sends the blood through the lungs so that it may be aerated, or acted upon by the oxygen in the inhaled air, while the left heart sends the blood through the body in order to nourish the tissues.

Both of these hearts receive the blood from the large veins into the auricles, which by contracting send the blood on into the ventricles, and when these powerful muscles contract the right ventricle pumps the blood into the pulmonary artery on the way to the lungs and from the left ventricle into the aorta, which distributes the blood all over the body, so that after having nourished the nerves and muscles it returns through the veins to the heart, there to be pumped into the lungs for purification by the oxygen before again passing through the sytsem.

The difference in the sounds of the right and left ventricles is traced to the difference in resistance of the aorta and the pulmonary artery. The pulmonary artery resists with only onethird the strength of the aorta, so the pumping force required is less and the noise of the closing gates is that much

It is true, then, that when the physician listens to the beating of a patient's heart through his stethoscope the heart speaks to him in unmistakable language. When it plainly says "lub dup" he knows that all is well with this important organ, and he pats the patient on the shoulder, saying, "Nothing serious; you'll be all right in a day or two." When, however, the heart says "lub-duff" he knows that the aortic valve is not working properly and takes the proper steps to correct it. When the heart says "luft-dup" he is sure that the mitral valves are out of order, and he tries to reach

When the heart says "luff-duff" he draws a solemn face, for both valves "oho-oho" he digs down into his bag and goes to work at once, for all is radically wrong.-Detroit News-Tribune.
